TIRING the years 1887-88 many new remedies have been prof I J fered for use in dental medicine and surgery, most of them being on trial by dental therapists at this time. Included in this list, which is not complete, may be found creolin, sodium fluorsilicate, guaiacol, several coal-tar derivatives, and the active principles of many of the essential oils. The activity in chemical circles is so great that medical literature is burdened with the number of remedies belonging to the antipyretic and the anti-neuralgic classes. Among the latter may be mentioned antipyrin and antifebrin, constitutional remedies of great value in facial neuralgia. The continued study of microbes and the lists of germicides and disinfectants to annihilate them go side by side. No sooner is a new microbe discovered than the therapist offers a choice collection of...
